Editorial

Writing is one of the foundational skills in life, more significant in the academic arena. Whatever confronts us needs to be questioned, and the result is debate, discussions and interpretations which minimize the scope of confusion. Happy is the man who, with his power of knowledge, can alleviate confusion in his path of exploration. Thus, the ability to write down one's ideas is of paramount importance within or without the academic world.

Building up the body of your argument comes from your understanding the subject you are dealing with, and the way you present it indicates your style. The researcher is not a solitary writer confined to an 'ivory tower'; he or she requires sources to build up their statement and also proper feedback to have his/her ideas tested and strengthened.

While dealing with the sources it is the responsibility of the author to make proper citations. The technical aspects are more challenging than the ethical issues. Deficiency in proper acknowledgement, though unintended sometimes, may cast a shadow implying lack of integrity.

Just presenting some proof of one's background study may not be adequate. Evidence needs to be analyzed to elucidate information for the readers within the framework of research commitment. There goes a saying: "A problem clearly stated is a problem half solved." Likewise, a research problem, when analyzed with clarity, leads to the avenues of resolving it.
